Honda CBR 1000F Before the CBR1100XX Super Blackbird appeared in 1996, the CBR1000F was Honda's fast sports tourer. When the CBR1000 first appeared in 1987, alongside its smaller 600cc sibling, it was one of the fastest, most accomplished machines available, and later versions had even better performance and handling.

Honda CBR 1000F - Motorcycle Specifications

I've owned a 90 CBR 1000F for about a year now. It's a nice, comfortable sport-tourer, but its large bulk makes it a little difficult to toss around in the corners. Watch for the typical Honda cam-chain tensioner problems. Good wind protection. Decent speed and quickness considering it's a 10 year old bike.

The CBR1000 is Honda's flagship sports roadster. It is not a race replica. It excels or at being a versatile, all-rounder, sports-angled for sure, but 1 also sensibly equipped with just about everything the fast long-distance rider requires. Call it a deluxe highway express cruiser.

1988 Honda CBR 1000F - Motorcycle Specifications

The Honda CBR1000F was a long-lived sport tourer that did everything well, though period reviews suggest it wasn't as exciting as the competition. Still, 135 horsepower at 155 miles per hour can't be too boring, right? This example has just been unearthed from over a decade in storage, which is why it has just 16,530 miles.

Honda Motorcycle Instruments and Gauges for Honda CBR1000F ...

The Achilles heel of the CBR1000F is the cam chain tensioner which usually fails at around 20,000 miles although they have gone sooner and later. When it fails it gives a very pronounced rattle from the top end although if there is a rumble from the bottom end it could be a little backlash in the balancer arrangement, which can be dialled out with around half an hours work with basic hand tools.
